

Creek, Michael

Michael Creek works to bring science, policy and the public into dialogue together. He designs and facilitates workshops that get people talking about the big ethical and social questions around research and innovation. These workshops draw on participatory methodologies, using playful formats to ensure meaningful conversations with concrete outcomes, where all voices are equal. Michael has twelve years of experience in the sector, having started out coordinating dialogue projects with science museums. Originally from the UK, Michael is now based in Brussels. He holds a Masters in Linguistics and speaks French, Dutch and Spanish to professional level. As well as senior advisor at Third-i, he is co-founder of Stickydot, Brussels' community space for science engagement.
