

Hinlopen, Corinne

Wemos

Corinne studied Sociology and Development Studies at Wageningen University (The Netherlands) with specialisations in health education and public health. After graduation she worked in a variety of public health related projects in Niger, Ecuador and Bangladesh. In 2001, she earned her Master's in Public Health at the Netherlands School of Public Health, after which she worked with various public health organizations in the Netherlands, in the fields of infectious diseases, food and nutrition, non-communicable diseases, health promotion and disease prevention. Realizing once again that lasting improvements in (public) "Health for all" require intersectoral, systemic changes as well as international collaboration, Corinne set her mind to working in international advocacy and joined Wemos in 2014. She focuses on human resources for health, health systems, the Sustainable Development Goals and on 'leaving no one behind' and likes to challenge institutions on their contributions to global public goods for health.
