

Mattke, Soeren

University of Southern California

Soeren Mattke is the Director of the Center for Improving Chronic Illness Care at the University of Southern California. Dr. Mattke is an expert in evaluating new technologies and products as well as innovative approaches to organizing, financing and delivering health care services, especially for patients with chronic conditions. He was the senior author on a study to assess the preparedness of the U.S. healthcare system to deliver a disease-modifying treatment for Alzheimer's disease, and leads ongoing projects to extend the work to other countries, as well as work to address the capacity constraints. He earned his MD at the University of Munich, where he trained as internist and cardiologist, and his Doctor of Science in Health Policy at Harvard.

(last updated 28.09.2018)