Anya Sitaram is a journalist, communications consultant and professional moderator specialising in health, science, environment and international development. A former news anchor, Health and Science Correspondent and BBC Tomorrows World presenter, Anya is Executive Producer at Rockhopper, an award winning television and film production company. Anya leads the production of documentary films for broadcasters; educational, advocacy and campaign films for UN bodies, charities and NGO’s and promotional videos for corporate clients. She has overseen 300 plus documentaries which have run on BBC World News, Discovery, PBS, National Geographic and Al Jazeera among others. Anya began her career as a BBC trainee before becoming ITN Health and Science Correspondent and later a presenter on the BBC’s flagship science programme Tomorrow’s World where she reported on medical breakthroughs around the world. Anya was also an anchor on Sky News and BBC World news. Anya has recently completed a contract working in communications for the National Health Service in England where she worked on the most extraordinary “story” of her career - not as a journalist but handling NHS communications on the Salisbury Novichok poisoning incident.
